What Photoshop Does Essentially,
Photoshop's features work like this:

The user creates a new image through selecting a background and an object (or several objects). Then, the user edits the selected background and the selected object (or objects) using different layers.

There are so many ways to edit an image in Photoshop that the features alone could fill hundreds of books. To start with, you need to create a new image, which could take a few minutes to prepare. You can start the process by pressing the "New" button in the tools folder, or you can drag the background over to the new canvas.

After you have created your new image, you can adjust its size to fill your canvas, and you can use the colors in your browser to set the background color. Change the background color of your new image. After you select the background and object colors, you then select the type of object you want to add to your image. You can create a new object and keep it separate from your background or you can make it a part of your background. The latter option lets you quickly set all the objects in your image to the same background color, just as you would with a copy-paste action in other programs, such as Microsoft Word. Animate an image by changing the background color and object color. After you have set your background and object colors, you need to create a new image layer, which is similar to creating a new layer in other programs, such as Microsoft Word. You can make a new layer anytime in your image, and you can do so for each and every object you want. However, you do not need to create a new layer for every object you add. You can just add a new layer for your entire image and then use the layer as needed. For example, you can make one layer for the sky, one for clouds, and one for mountains to then control them individually. To add a new layer in Photoshop, select the Layer icon in the tools folder, create a new one (press the New button), and then select the Fill Style button. In the Layer Style window, you can change the layer's color or background and move it over your canvas. Add a new layer to your image. After you have created each layer, you have to define them by selecting a style, adding a new layer mask, and then defining its opacity. To create new objects, you have to create a new layer
